要旨:
One important concern in the design of qualitative research interviews is how much or how little the interviewer and the interviewee should have in common. The commonalities and differences between the interview participants are assumed to shape the interview interaction and hence the potential for generating informative and rich data on the interview topic. This talk will first discuss different recommendations on interviewer – interviewee relations made in the methodological literature on qualitative research interviews. It will then examine how the participants in a large qualitative interview study position themselves and each other on such matters as cultural, linguistic, and historical knowledge, and how such knowledge claims and attributions invoke identities and community memberships.
