Graduate School of Governance (Master's Degree Program)

Graduate School, Major and Enrollment Capacity

Graduate School	Major	Enrollment Capacity
Graduate School of Governance	Governance Major	12

Note: The Graduate School of Governance has not established separate enrollment capacity for each type of entrance examination.

Objectives of the Graduate School of Governance

The Graduate School of Governance offers comprehensive, interdisciplinary education and research opportunities in the international community. It was established with the objective of fostering highly ethical, highly specialized professionals and researchers who can put policies they have developed on their own into practice based on skills for determining issues that also apply on an international level as well as policy forming and evaluation skills.

Goals of Human Resource Development

The Graduate School aims to foster highly-skilled public and private professionals with strong moral ethics who can put policies they have developed on their own into practice based on skills for determining issues that also apply on an international level, policy-forming skills and policy evaluation skills as highly specialized professionals.

Education and Research Objectives

The Graduate School of Governance (Master's Degree Program) aims to cultivate highly-qualified human resources to play active role in public matters, that is, highly-qualified professionals and researchers who internationally and interdisciplinary bear education and research activities and put policies designed by themselves into practice, and also have abilities of finding out the issues accepted worldwide, and planning and evaluating policies, with high level of academic ethics.

The Graduate School of Governance (Ph.D. Degree Program) aims not only to cultivate highly-qualified professionals who internationally and interdisciplinary bear education by making the best of demonstrating their knowledge and skills with high level of the capabilities of "Think and Act", but also to cultivate autonomous researchers who can contribute to both domestic and global societies.

Types of Students Sought

The following students are sought for the Graduate School of Governance (Master's Degree Program):

- (1) To have the background knowledge of the problems of global and advanced information societies.
- (2) To have the basic knowledge of the undergraduate course about any field of social sciences such as jurisprudence, political sciences, economics and business administration, or natural sciences such as urban engineering, environmental studies and statistics.
- (3) To have the basic capabilities of "Think and Act" and the basic abilities for problem finding, policy designing.
- (4) To have the proper assessment, as well as logical thinking and expression.
- (5) To have basic communication skills and also have strong willingness to solve both global and regional problems.

The following students are sought for the Graduate School of Governance (Ph.D. Degree Program):

- (1) To have the background knowledge of the problems of global and advanced information societies
- (2) To have the basic knowledge of the master's degree program about any field of social sciences such as jurisprudence, political sciences, economics and business administration, or natural sciences such as urban engineering, environmental studies and statistics as the subjects and methods of political studies require characteristically interdisciplinary and diversified approaches.
- (3) To have the basic capabilities of "Think and Act" and the basic abilities for problem finding, policy designing.
- (4) To have the proper assessment, as well as logical thinking and expression.
- (5) To have basic communication skills and also have strong willingness to solve both global and regional problems.

Educational Advantages

The Graduate School of Governance aims to foster professionals who can discover public issues and design and form policies to resolve those issues with a policy studies foundation.

One advantage of education in the Graduate School of Governance is that research guidance is provided to each student through a system in which guidance is provided by multiple faculty members. This enables students to carry out multi-faceted research on social problems using various approaches.

Practical Study Advisor

Rather than the conventional format of a single specified advisor providing all guidance from admission to the university until completion of the degree, the Graduate School of Governance has multiple faculty members provide such guidance. Set a topic you wish to study for each field, referring to the list of dedicated faculty and specialist fields below. A number of faculty members who are closely involved in those topics will provide research guidance.
