概要

With special consideration to heavy writing workloads, William Marcus reports on a trialed approach to process writing that effectively streamlines student collaboration and holistic assessment. The role of online documents, student project management and timed summarizing tests frame a novel and pragmatic approach to addressing the problem of multiple-draft writing across large student numbers. Oliver Kinghorn highlights the merits of timed tasks within a current SLA framework while Andy Decker adds insights from trialing this approach currently to further discussion on how it may be applied to different teaching contexts.
