概要

In research on second language learning, the concept of the “individual” and the development, analysis, and understanding of learner behaviors stems from the field’s origins in psychology. Once second language acquisition (SLA) came to be an independent field of study, the concepts introduced from psychology led to the creation of research methods that have shaped the core of the field. Among the concepts borrowed from psychology are the approaches to understanding how learners are different from one another. The purpose of this workshop is to give a brief history of the origins of the concept of the individual in SLA, examine its uses in second language pedagogy and methodology, and discuss potential implications of modern psychology on the future of SLA.
