概要

As the pandemic places constraints on physical presence, remote learning has rapidly become the new normal. As a result, foreign language teachers are having to navigate the rapid switch to remote instruction. In addition, having an engaging virtual classroom is a challenge to many language instructors due to the lack of direct teacher-student interaction.

This workshop will offer a method for teaching vocabulary as a pre-reading activity intended to simulate “in-person interaction” in the physical classroom. This also includes a teaching model on introducing a set of pros and cons related to a reading text, serving as an example topic that allows instructors and learners to achieve a similar experience that they would have in an in-person class. Regardless of whether learning takes place remotely or face-to-face, this workshop will help participants to develop a supportive classroom that requires the right tools for learning.
