概要

Continuing with the theme of changes in education in response to the global pandemic (following the previous FD workshop, “Remote Teaching Practices” by Ana Hofmeyr), this session will focus on the results of a survey done with students (as opposed to teachers) reflecting on the first semester of the 2020 academic year. The objective is to facilitate a discussion on how this information can help shift online education to become more student-focused, with the goal of reducing learner burden in both technology and in time spent unnecessarily in front of a screen, as well as improving learners’ self-efficacy. The effects of these drastic changes in education have been felt by both educators and students alike, with new challenges arising at each step. The measures taken to provide high-quality education online were hastily put in place, for which many students were not prepared to face, which this workshop aims to address. Participants will be asked to contribute from their own experiences as teachers and students.
