概要

The coronavirus pandemic has forced educators from all over the world to look beyond face-to-face classes and consider alternative, digital ways in which to deliver content. This abrupt transition has also affected foreign language courses and raised questions regarding best practices in language education and the growing role of digital platforms. This faculty development workshop will be based on a survey conducted among foreign language lecturers at Kansai University, and it will look at the approaches chosen by the lecturers to transfer classes from a face-to-face format to online platforms. We will consider and discuss the main rationales behind teachers' choices, as well as the perceived advantages, disadvantages, and impact of each type of approach. This workshop will also look beyond the choices made in the Spring semester and consider the mid- and long-term impact of these changes on foreign language education.
