概要: Few studies have investigated the effects of study-abroad (SA) experiences on second language (L2) writing abilities compared to the number of studies that have investigated other forms of L2 knowledge and skills. This is regrettable because writing skills in an L2, especially in English as a Lingua Franca, is now indispensable in a highly IT-intensive world, and SA is one of the means through which L2 literacy can be acquired in the most appropriately socio-literate manner. In this presentation, I therefore take a broad view of L2 writing, where text construction requires not only linguistic components such as vocabulary, syntax, and cohesion but also knowledge of genre and a multi-competent repertoire of knowledge. I first summarize how the effects of SA on L2 ability and especially on writing skills have been investigated. I then proceed to how these effects may be better studied in terms of research target, method, and theoretical orientation. Finally, I plan to invite the audience to an imagined graduate-level L2 writing class in an English-speaking university where they might glimpse how a cutting-edge topic is discussed as a simulated experience of being an L2 writer in a study abroad context.
